As excuses have had to be made in both of the games in which Cantillon's band has been defeated, the Browns will not have a very exalted opinion of our sportsmanship in refusing to give them credit for the games they win, but it must be said that they were just as lucky in o'clock. capturing yesterday's contest as they were on the day previous.

On Thursday, with one man on base, Joe Yeager lifted a fly to right field, and Kitson in the outfield. it hopped into the bleachers, giving the ex-Yankee a home-run and deciding the contest right then and there. Yesterday it was up to Harry Howell to do the deed, and he went Yeager one better by waiting until there were two out and in the same direction, and the sphere went bounding along on the chalk line into the stands, giving St. Louis three runs. It went to practically the same spot where Yeager's landed and was the salvation of the visitors, for had it remained on the field of play they would not have gotten more than one run as the next batter was easy picking, and during the remaining seven innings they during the remaining seven innings they linning. Harry Howell and Oscar Graham were the opposing pitchers. In every inning of the game the Nationals got one or more men on bases; but it was not until the last third of the game that they commenced to get in timely hits on the famous spit-ball artist. Graham pitched a fairly good game of ball; but the handicap of the second inning was too great to overcome, and in the sixth Falkenberg was sent to the center of the diamond.
